WORKING PAPERS

Interest Groups' Contributions and Political Selection: Evidence from Brazil

JOB-MARKET PAPER, download

While the role of interest groups' contributions in shaping policies has been well-studied, little is known about their effects on political selection and electoral outcomes. This paper studies a Brazilian reform that banned firms' contributions to provide evidence in this regard. I use a weighted differences-in-differences strategy exploiting variation in municipalities' and candidates' dependence on firms' funding before the reform. I find that the ban had little effect on political competition. However, it deteriorated the electoral advantage of low-educated incumbents and of incumbents from traditional political parties. The negative effects for incumbents are concentrated in oil-dependent municipalities, where rent-seeking is more likely, and in localities with lower economic growth and higher mortality rates. These results are consistent with the reform crowding out incumbents who heavily relied on the financial advantage to be re-elected rather than on a good performance while in power.

The Wise, the Politician, or the Strongman: National Leaders' Type and Quality of Governance

R&R, download

There is strong evidence that national leaders matter for the performance of their nations, but little is known about what drives the direction of their effects. I assess how national leaders' quality of governance, measured by five indicators, varies with their career and education. Using text analysis and a sample of 1,000 national leaders between 1932 and 2010, I identify five types of rulers: military leaders, academics, high-level politicians, low-level politicians and lawyers. I find that in autocracies leaders' backgrounds significantly affect their quality of governance. Military leaders tend to be associated with an overall negative performance despite their positive effect on economic growth. Instead, politicians who have held visible offices before taking power are associated with a better quality of governance. National leaders with a university degree, law background, as well as academics, have overall non-significant effects. This highlights the weakness behind the use of the educational attainment as a proxy for politicians' quality.

Gender differences in re-contesting decisions: New evidence from French Municipal Elections

With Marc Sangnier, submitted - download

This paper studies differences across genders in the re-contesting decisions of politicians following electoral wins or defeats. Using close races in mixed-gender French local elections, we show that women are less likely to persist in competition when they lose compared to male runners-up, but are equally or more prone than male winners to re-contest when they win. Differences in observable characteristics or in the expected electoral returns of running again cannot fully account for these gender gaps in persistence. In contrast, the heterogeneity of the results across political ideology, age, experience and occupation suggests that behavioural explanations are at play. Additionally, we provide evidence that a woman's victory encourages former female challengers to re-contest but does not trigger the entry of new female candidates.
